To this day, note-taking remains one of the main ways of working with text and audio speech at university and college.

Notebooks with lecture notes allow you to quickly and systematically memorize the information you hear and quickly reproduce the necessary details when necessary.

Handwritten notes of monographs, scientific articles and certain chapters of a textbook activate motor memory (one of the most durable, by the way) and facilitate comprehension of what has just been read.

A computer-printed text outline is convenient for further use in an electronic digital environment.

One way or another, even if in some updated and modernized form (e.g., in electronic format), but lecture notes as a type of obligatory university work duty will remain.

So it is not surprising that LaLaLan wrote about outlines and their preparation.
